

GENDER DIFFERENCES IN COMMUNICATION

Hemanth, R
20190319

Introduction:

There is a robust argument if men and women communicate differently. But, besides the argument, it is a true fact that men and women communicate differently. By nature, people of different genders respond differently to a stimulus.

Why there is a difference? And what differences...

Mostly, every growing up boy or girl is segregated, thus restricting them to mingle and socialize with individuals of same gender, but this stereotype has resulted in men and women learning a distinct culture. For example, men most likely communicate as a way to maintain their position in workplace, basically to maintain their status, but women tend to communicate more often to develop friendship and small talks. So basically, men communicate for advising in workplace, while women mostly use communication to get closer. In terms of eye contact, we could say women typically use more direct eye contact in order to make a good connection, while men commonly use eye contact as a part of communication, as a strong challenge, and less likely for friendships.

We could say, in general that men using linguistic communication could well be to getting things done, and exchange facts, whereas women usually talk about people, feelings and exchanges softer words. Mostly, men's way of using language is more of competitiveness, reflecting facts, while women generally communicate for co-operativeness. So, women interact mainly to develop some co-operation and understanding.

Women usually talk more than men, as per studies. The status of theirs also affect their communication. Domestic interactions and workplace interactions usually are more common. Communication is in itself complex, and adding gender differences into the mix only complicates. We must not generalize, stereotype men and women. Learn about the communication of men and women, and act accordingly is probably the way to understand the differences and adapt the styles of communication.

So, in conclusion, we could say, men and women have a lot of differences in speaking and communicating, and we must understand those and understanding that in itself would help people communicate effectively, since gender barrier is ~~more~~ taken away & people speak ~~the~~ effectively. So listen, and then communicate. Listening and understanding is important.